ANTECEDENTES

The transactions carried out by the government of a country with the individuals or industrial, commercial or business organizations, domestic or international, for the purposes of sale, purchase, construction, acquisition of service, disposal of obsolete goods, etc., are called public contracts. In countries following civil law system these contracts are generally known as “contract administratif” or Marches Publics.

In the matters of contracts, some distinction is inevitable between the position of the State, whose main concern is the betterment of the society as a whole, and an individual who views his own benefit. There are special rules of procedure to be followed while selling to or buying from the government. Failure to comply with the prescribed formalities renders a contract unenforceable. Necessarily, the government must operate solely through representatives, who, unlike agents in private enterprises, lack supervising capacity motivated by personal profit incentive. The government is not bound by an agreement unless the officer making it has express authority to enter into contracts on behalf of the government and has acted within the scope of this authority. The division of government functions results in one authority providing funds, another determining the manner of expenditure, and frequently, the third performing the actual purchasing while the user of such purchaser is the fourth authority. The fifth authority supervises and controls the entire procurement activities of the procuring entities. The government reserves to itself a right to terminate the contract at any time without assigning any reasons. Procurement matters in some countries enjoy sovereign immunity against legal actions. Similarly, a longer period of limitation is available to the governments and public procurement entities for filing suits and other legal proceedings than available to ordinary persons or private business entities. In fact, some of these are the privileges enjoyed by the “governments or public authorities”.

Public procurement contracts are a very wide subject. Tremendous amount of administrative and legal literature is available on the subject of public contracts in the world and on various websites. A large number of books and articles have been written by various eminent authors on the subject. Further, literature on public contracts is country specific. Every country enters into a large number of public contracts every year and has laws, conditions, rules, books and other material on the subject of public contracts. Therefore, in this course an attempt has been made to inform the participants about some of the major principles of public procurement contracts.
