What will I learn?

This 3-hour self-paced course provides a general introduction to the relationship between human rights and the environment. It explains the bases for the application of human rights to environmental issues, and the procedural and substantive obligations relating to the environment. It also gives examples of constitutions that have incorporated a right to a healthy environment, good practices in procedural and substantive environmental protection.

Is this course for me?

All stakeholders interested to learn about the main aspects of the relationship between Human Rights and the Environment can benefit from the course. Prior knowledge is not a requirement for participation. The contents are presented on a progressive manner, from generic to specific elements. Participants will encounter no difficulties to go through the contents, completing the exercises and tests.

Will I receive a Certificate?

All participants who successfully complete all the assessments, in accordance with the established passing grade, will receive a joint certificate UNITAR – UN Environment.
